Awful Tragedy of the Sea at Night in Mid-Atlantic—Wireless Brings Aid, But Too Late to Save All—The Crew Stuck by the Ship

While the fate of the majority of the 2,100 persons on board the mammoth White Star liner Titanic, which sank early yesterday on the Newfoundland Banks after collision with an iceberg, still remains in doubt, and it is feared more than 1,200 persons were lost, a note of good cheer came from the ocean today by wireless from the might bring word of cheer. But anxiety deepened and many friends and relatives of those who sailed on the Titanic began to despair as hour after hour passed and the night grew old without word from either of the Allan liners, Carpathia or Virginian, believed to be, with the exception of the Carpathia, the vessels nearest the Titanic's ocean burial place when she made her plunge.

As the Titanic sank about 2 o'clock in the morning, and it was not hoped that the Virginian could reach the scene before 10 A. M. at the earliest, while the Carpathia was said to be some distance farther away, it was feared even by the White Star officials, trying their best to calculate differently and yet accurately, that they would not have reached the scene in time to be of service.

A GRAVE TWO MILES DEEP
The steamer Virginian was finally heard from at 2:15 o'clock this morning. She did not report the presence of any survivors on board, the message from her stating that she would bring to St. John's, N. F., such survivors as she "may rescue." The fact that the Virginian was to go out of her course to put into St. John's on her voyage to Liverpool, was taken as a favorable indication, arousing hope that after all she might have picked up some of the victims of the wreck and was bringing them into port.
